2020 election polls fox news map

As the results came to Florida On Tuesday night, many Democrats had the feeling that Donald Trump was once again on the road to victory. They were expecting a decisive victory from Biden on election night, and for Democrats to turn the Senate. Their hopes were by no means unfounded: they had been consuming a steady diet of survey numbers that targeted those things for weeks, months. The Washington Post-ABC News poll (rated A+ by FiveThirtyEight) had on demand 17 points, between 57% and 40%, on Trump in the state of Wisconsin. The Cook Political Report said Texas, a traditional non-smoking Party strongman, was a cough this year. Pollsters told us that suburban women had abandoned Trump. Biden scored a win in Wisconsin, but for less than a point, not 17. Texas remained red. More suburban women voted for Trump than in 2016. And pollsters have found thee in a crisis of credibility. How can we trust them again? First, it's important to understand how polling works. Pollsters try to form a sample group of people that resembles an electorate microcosate, which proportionally reflects all demographic and ideological groups. If any group is over or under-represented, projections made with the sample may be flat. According to most accounts, Trump did not win by expanding his base as much as he did by getting more votes from the same demographics he did in 2016. The head of these groups are white Republicans without college degrees, who came out in an unprecedented number and were once again underestimated by pollsters. The Trump voter timid A popular theory about how pollsters may have lost that voter blockade is Trump's shy voter, referring to Trump supporters who for one reason or another were not honest with phone surveyors about their election candidate. Shy Trump's voter exists, says Columbia Business School professor Michael Slepian, who did a study of them after the 2016 election. He says these voters hide their intention to vote for Trump for two main reasons. Sometimes they do it to avoid going into discussions with friends or family. But the main reason is that they're trying to control how people see them. It turns out that the concern about his reputation is the one that is predominantly linked to people who didn't want to admit that they were supporting Trump, Slepian says. People fear that being overtaken as a Trump sympathizer could damage their social position or career opportunities, Slepian says. And there's every reason to believe the political divide and rancour around the 2016 elections have only increased in 2020. Operating in this theory, a group of usc researchers, MIT and the Sante Fe Institute developed a different way of figuring out if a person intended to vote for Trump. Instead of asking the question directly, they asked people to estimate the percentage of their social contacts that for each of the candidates. The social circle question was added to this year's Dornsafe Daybreak poll, and returning answers suggested Trump would get enough votes to win the Electoral College. While the results are promising (the answers to Biden's predicted social circle questions would gradually win the popular vote), the surveying approach needs more evidence with larger samples. While Shy Trump voters probably presented a problem for pollsters this year, a bigger problem may have clouded the vision of electorate pollsters. Why some voters are invisible at the urnsSflrst, a bit of history. Opinion research has become much more difficult in the 21st century. Once in all, it was possible to generate a good random sample by just calling people on their home phones, Veteran GoP Pollster Scott Tranter told me. In the 1960s, 1970s and 100s, they could call 100 people and get response rates of 30 or 40 percent, says Tranter, who now works at the election data companyCap the headquarters of Decision Desk. Now they call a hundred people and get two or three. That's partly because we use cell phones now, and in the age of phone spam we've learned not to pick up calls from numbers we don't recognize. That raises questions about the two or three that complete a phone poll, and how representative of large groups of voters they really are, Tranter says. One of the voter groups that is less likely to do a phone poll, or even pick up the call, is the block of non-college voters that make up a significant part of Donald Trump's base, says Mike Greenfield of opinion poll company Change Research. The difficulty of reaching those people once mattered less because they were distributed more evenly between the two main parties. However, white voters without college degrees have migrated to the Republican Party in large numbers over the past 20 years, Greenfield tells me, as they perceived that the modern Democratic Party no longer had blue-collar interests in its heart. One of the tough lessons pollsters learned in 2016 is that they can no longer make assumptions about white voters and not with grade based on the political preferences of an adjacent demographic. This concept works very well for some population groups: The political preferences of blacks with a college degree and blacks without one are not so different, for example. Approximately 9 out of 10 people in both groups elected Biden as president. But it works terribly for non-college targets. The views of that group do not align very well with those of university whites. Data from Edison Research's exit surveys show that 50% of whites with titles voted biden, while 48% chose Trump. White men without college degrees, for their part, broke sharply for Trump: 67% to 30%. White women with grades almost chose Trump over Biden, from 50% to 49%, while unqualified white women broke for Trump between 60% and 39%. Some pollsters recognize that they subsample these hard-to-reach non-college targets, and then try to giving them extra weight in the projection numbers. But that calculation misses something. Without actually speaking to a representative sample of these voters, it is difficult for pollsters to understand their level of enthusiasm and the likelihood that they will come to vote. Therefore, whites without a university degree are not only the hardest to reach, but their views cannot be determined either without direct sampling. Greenfield believes this is a more likely explanation for pollsters' misleading projections in the months before this year's election that Shy Trump Voter. It may be within the distance of technologists to find ways to survey hard-to-reach voters. Research by Professor Emilio Ferrara, also from the USC, suggests that unstilted whites may have another reason to reject pollsters. Believers in QAnon's conspiracy theory have a deep distrust of the media of establishments such as the New York Times and the Washington Post, the same organizations that sponsor or conduct political surveys, so they can hang up when they hear those names on the phone. Ferrara found that major polls underestimated Trump by supporting the worst in states where Q-related Twitter activity was highest. Tranter says it may be the responsibility of technologists to find ways to survey hard-to-reach voters. Greenfield, who was the first data scientist in PayPal and then LinkedIn, co-founded Change Research with the idea of bringing a Silicon Valley approach to the problem, relying solely on the Internet to recruit and interview voters. Others hope to leverage artificial intelligence to more accurately sample voter opinion. A referendum on pollsters? Not all pollsters are wrong this year, and most top pollsters have some big things. Most chose Biden to win, and he did. They also correctly measured Biden's appeal in most states. And while data from exit polls provides information about what happened, pollsters and other researchers have just started researching the actual numbers. None of that is likely to prevent public confidence in political polls from eroding. But pollsters may not deserve all the blame. Many survey consumers have a vague understanding of pollsters' resignations that numbers are only likely and that margins of error matter. In addition, voting numbers are treated as if they were the score of a sporting event in the months and weeks leading up to an election. Polling is a matter of data science, not infotainment. So while the reputation and methods of pollsters take both pollsters and survey consumers have work to do by 2022. There's going to have to be more work to determine the polling error, Tranter says. And the public needs to understand what that polling error means. Correction: An earlier version of this story stated that the social circle question was developed by USC researchers. In fact, it was a team of researchers from USC, MIT and the Sante Fe Institute. He also did not mention that while the answers to the questions of the social circle a victory at the electoral college for Trump, also predicted a narrow popular victory for Biden. Biden.
